Third Point Aims to Replace Campbell Soup's Entire Board

Campbell is at a crossroads in its 150-year history, as consumers have turned away from its namesake canned soups and the company's pivot to fresher foods hasn't panned out. Last week, it announced plans to sell its international business and a fresh-food unit and refocus on its North American snack, meal and drink businesses. The decision to sell the units, which comprise roughly one-fifth of the company's revenue, came after the company examined a range of options including a full sale. It said last week

Activist investor wants to replace entire Campbell Soup board

In a scathing letter to the chairman of the company's board, activist investor Daniel Loeb blamed the board for Campbell's problems, accusing members of mismanagement, waste, ill-conceived strategy, and inept execution. ... But Campbell has exacerbated the situation with a series of bad bets. Interim CEO Keith McLoughlin recently said the company aggressively pursued the health megatrend without considering what differentiated Campbell from its many rivals. He said Campbell depended too much on mergers and acquisitions and lost focus on its own products and brands.
