Greg Haft, Head of Catastrophe

Congratulations on the recent announcement of the PartnerRe/Axis merger and on your appointment as Head of Catastrophe business for PartnerRe.

Thank you. I am excited about the appointment and about what we can do in the future as a combined entity.

Before the merger closes, will Willis Re broker access points remain the same?

All Willis Re broker access points remain the same prior to the transaction closing. Until that time, we must continue to conduct business as two separate entities. While I look forward to building on a combined balance sheet, for now we remain two strong competitors who are both looking to maintain or grow our own portfolios.

How will the merger with Axis benefit our clients and what comments have the rating agencies made on the proposed combined entity?

The PartnerRe/Axis merger significantly enhances our market position in reinsurance. We will become a top five global reinsurer and a leading a broker market reinsurer. Given the fast developing market environment, reinsurance buyers are increasingly looking for larger partners who can provide a broader range of products, greater capacity and solutions that allow them to efficiently access capital to grow their business. The combined group's financial strength and business expertise should be welcome positives to your clients. As brokers, you will benefit from a reinsurance market with strong underwriting capabilities and capital strength to provide meaningful solutions to your clients.

While I cannot comment on behalf of the rating agencies and their assessment process, history shows they always take a cautious approach to change and to varying extents, they have done so in this case. Following the announcement in January, S&P and AM Best put both companies on negative watch while Moody's affirmed PartnerRe's rating and put Axis on positive watch. Since then, on March 13, S&P has removed both companies from negative watch, confirming the current ratings of each.

Could you advise the impact of the acquisition on Axis/PartnerRe's approach to managing third party reinsurance capital?

It is early in the integration process, but you've seen the appointment of Jay Nichols to Head of Strategic Business Development and Third Party Capital of the combined company. It is clear that this segment will be an important piece of the combined company's puzzle. Both companies are moving forward individually in this arena in 2015 but the merger will continue this acceleration. While the strong expertise that is a hallmark of both companies will exist in the new entity, we're looking forward to leveraging our combined capabilities and strengths to channel third party capital to deliver even more solutions to our client base.

What are the key areas of post merger growth?

I cannot really comment about the A&H, Life or the insurance areas, except that we are all excited about the opportunities that those areas present for growth. In terms of reinsurance, we are already known for our global reach and expertise, but what the combination of PartnerRe and AXIS will bring is the capability of providing more capital to support the business we're in, or will write.

Specific to Catastrophe risk, how do you see the merger impacting our clients and our relationship with you as a combined entity?

The merger will enable us, and not just in catastrophe business, to further increase and enhance the expertise, products, capacity and solutions that we can offer to clients. The combined entity will have a shareholders' equity of nearly $13 billion and Cash and Investments of $33 billion. While we cannot discuss the combination of participation with our clients or brokers until the close of the deal, continuity of relationships with our clients is a priority for us. We believe our strong balance sheet and long-term relationships with you and your clients put us in a good position to grow our partnerships for the future.
